From the Southern Cultivator. CRAPE GROWING AND WINE MAKING MADE EASY.

The attention of all our readers, who desire to The attention of all our readers, who desire to participate in the pleasures and profits of Vineyard culture in the South, is called to the excellant treatise of A. DeCaradeuc, Esq., in the present number. Like very many others, we heretofore been deterred from entering largely into the Culture of the Vine, by tear of the expense and difficulty attending it. We have been taught to look upon the production of good Wine in the South, as exceedingly problematical. No one doubted the capacity of our sunny clime for the growth of the grape; "but"-the making of good wine afterwards—there lay the diffi-ently! Well, that difficulty has vanished—the mystery is solved-"granite laboratories" and deep cellars are perhaps, well enough in their way, but by no means indispensable; and hereafter, any man may plant his Vineyard with the same certainty of being able to make a largely paying crop of good wine, that he would feel of making broad from his corn or wheat field.

We have recently made two visits to the vine-yards of Dr. McDonnald, and our correspondent, Mr. DeCaradeuc. We have inquired minutely into their systems of planting and culture—we have examined their soils, locations and aspects have eaten their grapes, and drank their wines, of various flavors and qualities-but all purc, invigorating, and vastly superior to the foreign trash for which we pay so dearly. We have, (so far as our brief time would permit,) familiarized ourselves with their processes for making these wines, and with all the advantages and disadvantages of the business: and the result is, a deliberate conviction that the Field Culture of the Grape, as practised by these gentlemen, is one of the surcet and most remunerative branches of rural industry, and destined in a very few years to become of great and significant impor-tance to the South. There are thousands of acres of uplands all around us, too poor for either cotton or corn, that will pay from $200 to $500 per acre in wine, the third or fourth year from planting, and which, if properly managed, may be made to clear expenses from the very outset. Much of this land can be purchased for a mere trifle, (five to ten dollars per acre,) and if it will pay even two hundred dollars per acre in wine, after the third year, what other old, etc. A single vine is very different from field crop now cultivated in the South can begin twelve hundred to the acre!—and in many parts to compare with it? The experience of the of Italy, where they have adopted the tree cul vinters in Ohio, shows an average yield of four hundred gallons so the acre, and that we can safely count on equaling this, need not be never wish to see my vines average more than

In fact, the testimony of both the gentlemen above alluded to, (who have had sixteen years experience,) as well as the recent successes of Mr. Axt, and many others, justifies us in claiming for the Culture of the Grape far more attention than it has ever yet received in the South, and of earnestly urging it upon the notice of our subscribers.

We can fully endorse, from our own knowledge. all the statements of Mr. DeCaradeuc, and com-mend his article to the special attention of our readers. We do not claim perfection for his system—nor does Mr. C. himself—but we do contend that it is the cheapest, easiest, and surest way of profitably cultivating the Vine, yet offered to the public.

GRAPE GROWING AND WINE MAKING MADE BASY.

EDITORS SOUTHERN CULTIVATOR-Agreeably to your request, I now hand you a few remarks about our method of planting out and taking care of a Vineyard. I say, "our method," for I claim it as peculiar to Dr. McDonnald and myself; and we have adopted it, not through ignorance of more complicated and more costly methods, but, first, on account of its simplicity and cheapness, and then, having well succeeded. why should we alter our course? I do not preo say it is the best, nor do I wish to deter any so disposed to go to the expense of trenchare very many farmers who have not the means to incur such expenses, who wish to plant out an acre or two of vines, but are literally frightened out of it, not only by the mystery and difficulties which have, heretofore, been connected with the business, but, also, by fear of the money which is to come out of their pockets before they receive any returns. First, so many hundred dollars for trenching, and grubbing, and manuring; then so many more for vines; then so many more to learn how to stick the cuttings into the ground; and then so many more to learn how to prane; then to learn how to make the wine, how to keep it, etc; and, to crown it-all, so many thousands for a cellar. And, if it so happens, he is able and willing to stand all this, a hundred to one, he is frightened half out of his senses, and gives up in despair of ever being able to unravel the mystery, and master the awfal science of Wine making, especially if he happens to hear of "granite laboratories" being built for the express purpose of imparting instruction for a remuneration! PREPARATION OF THE LAND.

I prefer new land, such as would bring from | within three inches of the bung; less than that four to six bushels of corn to the acre; select, it would leave too much air in contact with the possible, a piece on easterly, southeasterly ex- wine, and would cause it to sour; more than possible, a piece on easterly, southeasterly exposure, and on a hill side, if you have such; if you have not, level land will do, provided it be not too retentive of moiscure. Sanday soil is the best, although dry clay hill sides will answer the best, although dry clay hill sides will answer very well. Clear the land and break it up with purpose, and close the bungs, tightly. Be very well. Clear the land and break it up with plows, as for corn; but all trees must, of course, be cut down and removed. Now get a parcel of be cut down and removed. I make my rows eight or nive feet apart. I prefer that distance on account of driving carts between to haul stakes, or manner, when it becomes necessary, or in vintage time. Having staked off the rows to your satisfaction, proceed to open the treaches or ditches; let them be about two feet wide, and from fourteen inches deep, large plows followed by long shovels, will very quickly do the work in sandy soil. The next thing is to plant; this from the planting and pruning to the bottling of regard to straightness; this is in order to prein sandy soil. The next thing is to plant; this can be done, in our Southern climate, from the planting and pruning to the bottling of middle of November to the end of March. I the wine. Put a short stake to each vine, to mark its place. There is nothing more to do until the spring grass will call your plows and hoes into use; then work them as you would corn or cotton. You may plant two rows of corn or peas between the rows, and they will not inter fere with the vines in the least. FIRST PRUNING.

In the winter, at any time between the 1st of December and the 15th of March, take a sharp knife; remove every branch except one, and cut that down above the second or third eye of the last growth; break the land with a half-shovel plow as for corn, passing the nearest furrow about twelve inches from the vines. Give them a stake about four feet long; they will, in the spring, shoot out many suckers, and put out eyes where they have no business; cut out the suckthe eyes excepting the two or three you left in pruning; these, as they grow up, should be fastened to the stakes, with hits of soft string, bark, tened to the stakes, with hits of soft string, bark, tened to the stakes, with hits of soft string, bark, tened to the stakes, with hits of soft string, bark, tened to the stakes. is to moderate and regulate the flow of the sap in order that it may fill all the eyes on the cane, for if the cane were left perpendicular, the sap would pass the lowest eyes, and rush upwards into the top. But, in my opinion, arching over-is always upwards, will most generally stop at cane is laid horizontally, they all get their share much more equally divided. The vine should also be strongly fastened to the large stake. All who plant vines must plant out Osier Willow, whose twigs are superior to any others for tying although I have made use of the young twigs of Black Gum, or of the Wild Willow, and of the bark of young Hickory.

During this summer, the vines will throw out strong branches, which must be fastened to the stakes as they grow, until they reach the top, when they may be left to hang over. Plow and of our Western brethren, and have taken it for and condemn without a trial, or even without knowing them. The Catawba is certainly a beautiful looking grape, and a great bearer; but its housed and wild musky flavor, (which is un-ortunately too strongly retained in the wine,) is a very serious objection for a palate accustomed to a more delicate fruit or beverage. The "boquet," or perfume, of wine is a precious quality, but this has "too much of the good thing."

Foreign grapes must be discarded for wine making. After a fair trial, we, like many others, have come to the conclusion that they canno

Of all the natives that have come within my reach, I give a decided preference to the Warren and the Isabella, both great bearers, but, like the Catawba, subject to the rot. The former makes a delicate wine of the color of Madeira, but not so strong; the latter, a light beautiful colored Claret, very similar to Bordeaux wines.

I, also, like what we here call the Burgundy and grapes being gathered, and all unsound or green berries removed, they are thrown into large tubs, or half barrels, and thoroughly crushed with the hand; the contents are then emptied into large vats, (hogsheads,) which are filled to within fourteen inches of the top; cover these with homespun and boards, to keep out gnats and flies. In a very short time fermentation commences; the mass swells and rises to the top, and should be pressed down, with a wooden paddle, two or three times per day. The next morning the clear juice is drawn from a fascet, near the bottom, and poured into a barrel; when no more juice comes out, the mass in the vat is then carried to the press and what liquid remains in it is squeezed out; this is usually very thick, and is put into another barrel, as it is of interior
